Course content

"If I survive, I know that I will have to break with the aroma of those essential years, silently reject (not repress) my treasure"

French poet and member of the Resistance Rene Char, quoted by Hannah Arendt, preface Between Past and Future, 1961.

This is a translation of the course syllabus approved in Swedish

To Hannah Arendt, real life begins only as a citizen, when you are able to participate in public life, or Public Happiness as she is quoting the American founding fathers. How come? Why is it so important to become a citizen and participate in public life? One could start by asking all the paperless refugees in Europe, stateless people, like Hannah Arendt herself who coined the term statelessness, while still being stateless.

Hannah Arendt, the philosopher and political thinker who celebrated public life, was also an intensely shy person who defended the private as the necessary counterpart to the public.

How does she think around these terms, the public and the private?

How does she divide between truth and facts in politics – and why?

How did she understand The Human Condition?

What does it mean to be a citizen?

We'll read and discuss texts from The origins of Totalitarianism, Truth and Politics and her Magnus Opus The Human Condition. We will also connect to Joakim Sandqvist's course on Public art.
